Background Information

Office of Attorney General – Eagle Feather Policy

http://fcnl.org/issues/nativeam/doj\_eagles/

In 1975, Department of the Interior Secretary C.B. Morton issued an enforcement policy (known for the past 35 years as the “Morton policy”) declaring that his department would not enforce the laws that protect migratory birds against Native Americans who possessed eagle feathers and other parts of migratory birds for religious and cultural purposes.

The policy states an intention to follow the 1975 Morton policy, which provided that eagle feathers and other culturally significant bird parts could be given to craftspeople who would incorporate them into ceremonial regalia and objects. Although the eagle feathers themselves cannot be bought or sold, the craftspeople may be compensated for the work that goes into the garment or ceremonial object. Specifically, the policy provides that Native Americans will not be prosecuted for the following:

- Possessing, using, wearing or carrying federally protected birds, bird feathers or other bird parts (federally protected bird parts);
- Traveling domestically with federally protected bird parts or, if tribal members obtain and comply with necessary permits, traveling internationally with such items;
- Picking up naturally molted or fallen feathers found in the wild, without molesting or disturbing federally protected birds or their nests;
- Giving or loaning federally protected bird parts to other members of federally recognized tribes, without compensation of any kind;
- Exchanging federally protected bird parts for federally protected bird parts with other members of federally recognized tribes, without compensation of any kind;
- Providing the feathers or other parts of federally protected birds to craftspeople who are members of federally recognized tribes to be fashioned into objects for eventual use in tribal religious or cultural activities.
